Turning Passive Students into Active Learners

It is generally accepted that we learn best when we are actively engaged in the learning process. In practical subjects like English it is better to do rather than sit and listen. But sometimes when we are faced with yawning, bored students with little or no enthusiasm, this is easier said than done. In this session we will look at practical activities to get the students involved, enthusiastic and motivated, turning passive students into active learners.

Projects – Making the most of them

Why do we do projects with our students? What do our students think of them? What should we as teachers consider when setting up projects and how do we get our students interested in them? We often do projects with our students but do we really consider why or how to set them up? In this session we will look at answers to all these questions and look at some practical activities to maximise the benefits of doing projects in the classroom.

Anette Igel has been working as a teacher of English since 2003. Before that she worked as a social worker and drama teacher, travelled part of the world for three years, and after taking her TESOL in Prague settled down in Brno. She is a teacher trainer for the IH CYLT (International House Certificate in teaching young learners and teenagers) and has presented at several conferences in the Czech Republic and Slovakia, and online for IH world. Currently she is the DoS at ILC IH Brno, but her main interest lies in teaching young learners.
