Title How Information Retrieval Systems Impact on Designers' Searching Strategies Within the Early Stages of the Design Process

URL <http://eprints.qut.edu.au/16280/>

Publication Date 2006

University/Publisher Queensland University of Technology

Abstract The purpose of this research is to investigate the influences that Information Retrieval Systems such as online Search Engines and Databases have on designers' early searching strategies. The study involves the observation of designers transforming early design language into query 'keyword' language for the operation of Information Retrieval Systems and how this transition causes a shift in early design exploration. This transformation is referred to in this research as the CLASS activity; Converting Language from Abstract Searching to Specific. Findings show a common pattern across the activity of both professional and advanced student designers. Information Retrieval Systems are seen to drive the searching process into specific, explored domains rather than stimulate an 'abstract' broad investigation. The IR systems are built upon categories that are created to manage the information content. It is these categories that require a person to use defined keywords and query sentences to operate the Information Retrieval Systems. The findings suggest that using Information Retrieval Systems prior to defining the scope of a design problem causes designers to prematurely focus on specific searching.

Subjects/Keywords design activity; industrial design; searching strategies; searching practices; information retrieval systems; design language; classification; abstract searching; specific searching; online databases; design research

Abstract:

The research examines strategic marketing practices involved in knowledge development and innovation in Scotland's rural hotels, as well as the business relations which potentially support this. The research draws on regional development literature – especially that concerned with innovation and flows of knowledge between small businesses. Rural development, tourism and hotel industry literatures are used to ground the research within a rural and wider tourism industry context. Referring to the critique of regional development literature, the role of different forms of proximity and the influence of competition in business relations are assessed. In doing so, the wider applicability of regional development concepts is tested and considered. Implications for public sector policy and support are assessed, with reference to tensions between rural development approaches and those adopted in Scottish tourism policy. The research uses a multi-method approach involving quantitative postal survey data, supplemented by qualitative interview data. Both marketing and relational activities were found to be limited in scope, focusing on short term, sales-oriented activities. Attitudes to co-operation varied depending on competitive considerations and the stage of the marketing process involved: trust-based issues, sectoral characteristics and internal business factors being influential. Geographical and organisational proximity were both found to be insufficient in supporting co-operation, geographical proximity even being detrimental in certain sets of relations. Public sector policy does not sufficiently address the constraints and opportunities facing smaller tourism businesses in their marketing and innovation activities. In both policy and theoretical terms there may be scope to avoid unnecessary polarisation between local and wider development, recognising a role for local or regional resources and development processes in achieving national objectives – simultaneously taking advantage of both competitive and co-operative approaches to relations and making use of local and extra-local inputs and networks.
